At Partnership for the Public Good, we root our policy development and advocacy in collective action, consensus, and co-governing models with community at the center. While ideal, there can be challenges in achieving consensus between communities, advocacy areas, and political establishments. How can we center communities that do not agree but struggle with the same social determinants of oppression? How can we view historical and contemporary examples of political divides as a mirroring tool for societal change? Learn more about local challenges in Western New York and how answers can be in plain sight and simultaneously out of reach.
